

Men and women are different. They see things, feel things and sometimes do things entirely differently. Apparently. It's as if they live in completely different worlds and are engaged in a war that's been going on a lot longer than Orson Welles would have us believe. Yet we can't live without each other. As Henry Kissinger famously said "No one will ever win the battle of the sexes; there's too much fraternising with the enemy". The good news is that there is plenty of laughter to be had along the way. Battle of the Sexes - War of the Worlds is a collection of the finest and funniest emails received by the author since the turn of the century that reflects just some of the back and forth exchanges between women and men. Many of them are unusual. Some of them may even be true. One thing is for sure - they are funny that they caused the author to laugh out loud when he received them and that is A Good Thing because of the fact that can never be stated too often: laughter is the very best medicine you can get. A warning is necessary for this book. If you are easily offended by content that is mildly adult, politically incorrect or extracts fun at situations involving stereotypical behaviour, please don't buy it. You will not enjoy it. This is a book aimed at generating laughter with ourselves, not creating social correctness. Entries were selected only if they met three criteria: - They made the recipient actually laugh out loud when received - They are not crude. (Adult is OK, mind you) - They are not derogatory towards any individual. The collection is short and sweet so it can be dipped into and enjoyed at your convenience during a break, a journey, a commute or over a drink; and all for less than the price of a coffee. Fill your boots. Enjoy the laughter.
