

Politics and Personalities: With Other Essays (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Politics and Personalities: With Other Essays I was lately addressing an audience of working men on the ethical aspects of war. After the address there was a discussion, and the question which excited the keenest debate was: What are we to do with the Kaiser when the war is over? In vain I reminded my friends of the adage about catching your hare before you cook him. Some - a few - were for St. Helena; the great majority were for capital punishment - either by shooting, as befits an officer and a gentleman, or by hanging, as the appropriate doom of one who has placed himself outside the pale of humanity. These interesting dissertations turned my thoughts to the venerable theme of Tyrannicide - to those who have practised it, and to those others who, in prose or in verse, have extolled it.
