Theres no pizzaz in my iced tea. -----Colin Stallard All is not well on Americas hit TV show, Idol. Its producer, Oscar Rove, has sunk into the worst of nightmares--low ratings. This may be the shows last season. The original co-producer of the show, Hyman Towal is shooting barbs at the show wishing for its demise. If Idol survives, its host Brian Watercress might be fired anyway. Suddenly two singers die right on the show. Was this a clever plan or a disaster? And what does Scientology have to do with it all? John Osipowicz was born in Madison, Wisconsin, and graduated (cum laude) from the University of Notre Dame. After college he worked in advertising for the Chicago Tribune, but then migrated into teaching mainly in the suburbs of Philadelphia. Currently he lives across from a horse farm, thirty miles west of Philly. He has a dog old enough for Social Security, and a cat so fat it's been mistaken for a raccoon. His hobbies are whimsy and leisure. The key to writing, he feels, is the ability to construct the next sentence. Being named John Osipowicz has its advantages and disadvantages. The advantage is that I'm usually referred to by my first name—the disadvantage is that maybe six people in my lifetime have pronounced my name correctly. To aid you in perhaps becoming the 7th Guinness Book of Records pronounceer, the last name goes like this: "O.C.—puv—itch." My parents loved me dearly but spoke maybe 27 words to me my entire growing up period. As a result, I did develop a full internal world, for which I'm eternally grateful. If you're not already familiar with it, I can refer you to Edgar Lee Masters' poem, "Silence," where he reveals all sorts of different kinds of silences: the silence of loss, the silence of misunderstanding etc. etc. Silence is its own reality, not the absence of reality. Because my parents didn't speak very much, I had time for thinking. I still enjoy that kind of silence. And for me to write I need that silence, so that words can be the sound I hear.
